TO BE EXPRESIDENT IS WORTH AT LEAST $50,000 A YEAR NOW

Good Positions With Much Honor, Little Work and Abundant Pay Await Those Who Quit the Presidential Job, and Taft Will Not Suffer.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Nov. 29.—When Mr. Taft goes out, he will be sure for the rest of his life of an income not much less than that which he has enjoyed while occupying the white house. It pays to be president; there is money in the job. Which statement does in no wise refer to the salary the government pays him, but to what awaits him in the way of lucrative employment after he has again become a private citizen. Merely to have held the office is thereafter worth $50,000 a year to any man. Take the case of Mr. Roosevelt, for example. Before leaving the white house he was best with tempting offers from publishers and other business concerns. He was invited to name his own price for his services. The Outlook's proposition was most attractive and he took it. Work? Nothing of that kind was really required of him. He was to be at liberty to write as much or as little as he wanted. If he never chose to produce a line his employment as contributing editor of a brand new species of job, by the way, was worth him $10,000 a year.

As a matter of fact, politics have occupied most of Mr. Roosevelt's attention since the Outlook engaged him, but his salary has gone on just the same. He is a skillful writer, but it was his name that counted. Mr. Cleveland, after he became an ex president, did a good deal of writing, at huge prices. Magazine editors paid him from $10,000 to $15,000 an article. What he wrote was dull and uninteresting; offered by anybody else, it would have been tossed with thanks. He had no knowledge of the literary art, but his signature was worth the money.

Mr. Cleveland had not been a very successful lawyer up to the time, when he entered the white house. But when he went out at the end of four years, one of the highest law firms in New York city was eager to employ him at $100,000 a year. "Salary," as "advisory counsel," for the sake of the business he was expected to attract it. It is doubtful whether he really did attract much, but he drew his pay just the same. He argued one case before the United States supreme court, and lost. He argued another, and won. That august body had been appointed by himself. Later on his legal work was mainly in the line of lucrative refereeing.

Benjamin Harrison was a lawyer, and had never managed to earn much money in the business. But after he left the white house his services were sought by corporations which paid him huge fees—often as much as $10,000 in a single case. The government gave him $100,000 in a lump for one piece of work which he would have been glad to do ten years earlier for one-twentieth of the amount.

Leland Stanford university, in California, put him on its roll as non-resident professor, at $10,000 a year to deliver a dozen lectures annually. He wrote also. A well known women's magazine paid him $1,000 a page for a series of exceptionally dry and uninteresting articles.

It was Grover Cleveland who said that the most crooked situation in the world was that of an ex president. What he had in mind was that a man occupying this position is supposed to be laid away on a shelf, and condemned to hopeless retirement. But he was surely ungrateful of its manifest advantages. He forgot that there had been ex presidents who, as in the case of John Quincy Adams, made useful and active careers for themselves after leaving the white house. And for himself was reserved the good fortune, unique in American history, of leaving the "shell" aforesaid to become president again.

John Adams was no charmer by his nature, but he was a shrewd politician. He refused even to shake hands with his successor, the hated Jefferson. He jumped aboard the "cannonball" special for Quincy, Mass., and secured himself for the next 25 years—he lived to be 91 years old—in his library. He was bitter jealous of his office, and his friendship for Washington was more than doubtful. But he survived long enough to see his son in the white house, and, through a wide correspondence, he retained a great deal of influence.

James Buchanan was saddened and unhappy. After leaving the presidency he became almost a hermit, living for eight years in the "hermitage" at Wheatlands, near Lancaster, Pa. The same thing might be said of Franklin Pierce, whose last 15 years were spent at his home in Concord, N. H. He saw a good deal of his friends, however, and liked to talk politics, making no secret of the fact that he was a southern sympathizer. Rutherford B. Hayes, tired of taking part in national affairs, wrote back Old France, only to dwell in what he called "delightful retirement."

Six ex-presidents became farmers. Hayes was one of them—though his pursuit of agriculture at Spiegel Grove was rather ornamental than other. Andrew Jackson went back to his farm near Knoxville. He also owned a mill and a country store. The estate of Andrew Jackson, called the "Hermitage" near Nashville, gave him farming occupation during the last eight years of his life.

James Madison's estate, in Orange county, Va., on which he lived for the last 19 years of his life, was of baronial size. His predecessor in the white house, Thomas Jefferson, was a very wise farmer, though not a very successful one. He entertained at "Monticello" on a most profuse scale, his hospitable roof often sheltering many as fifty guests at one time. He founded the University of Virginia.

On the 21st day of March 1787, George Washington, having surrendered the career of soldier, left Philadelphia for the new capital at Mount Vernon, accompanied by his wife and Nelly Custis. Nelly wrote a few days later to her friend, Mrs. Oliver Wolcott: "I have been very happy and much pleased with being once more a farmer Washington." There is no question of the fact that this refusal of a third term was due largely to the fact that he was weary of public life.

Four ex-presidents have taken to the law. Of these Cleveland and Benjamin Harrison were two. James Monroe, on leaving the white house, was a lawyer, and being anxious to recruit his finances, went to New York instead of going back to his home in Louisiana county, Virginia. But at that epoch the commercial value of a former chief magistrate had not come to be appreciated, and the author of the famous "doctrine" made rather a failure of it. Chester A. Arthur (who was greatly disappointed by his failure to obtain a second term) had likewise a legal career in mind when he returned to the metropolis, and even arranged for a law partnership. Incidentally, he accepted the presidency of a corporation which proposed to dig a tunnel under Broadway—at that time considered a visionary scheme.

the white house. John Adams, in recent years, compiled historical data. Grant wrote almost on his deathbed, a book about the civil war which earned a fortune for him. Adams, Cleveland, Benjamin Harrison and Roosevelt did magazine work. Five traveled extensively abroad. Van Buren, Fillmore, Pierce, Grant and Roosevelt.

Two ex-presidents occupied seats in congress—Andrew Johnson and John Quincy Adams. The former led the simple life at Knoxville for half a dozen years and was then sent back to Washington as a senator. He died less than a year later. Adams was nearly 60 years old when his term was up, and he would have liked to have gone back to Quincy and his books, as his father did, but the folks of his home district wanted him to be their representative, and he consented to serve. For 10 years he led the party in the house and in the chamber of that legislative body, at the capitol, he died. The place occupied by his desk is shown to this day by guides, marked by a brass star set in the marble floor.

Ten ex-presidents died rich men. Mr. Cleveland was probably worth $50,000. He had nothing when he entered the white house, but his investments in real estate proved very profitable, and he bought some mighty good stocks, such as Chicago gas, when they were cheap, under the advice of his millionaire friend, E. C. Benedict. Benjamin Harrison saved money hard while he was president, and went out of office with not less than $125,000. When he died, eight years later, he left $775,000, the bulk of it made out of the law.

Polk and Van Buren were both wealthy. The latter did not take the trouble to draw his salary until the end of his term, paying all expenses out of his private purse. Then he took the $100,000 due him in one lump. He was the richest of the presidents except Washington. Pierce and Fillmore were well off. The latter kept on with politics, and became the nominal head of the Know Nothing party, was beaten. Then he retired to spend a green old age at his home in Buffalo. John Adams was rich, but by no means so wealthy as his son, John Quincy, who owned much real estate in Washington (as well as in Boston). Madison left a considerable fortune, but it was dissipated by a worthless son. Congress paid his widow $20,000 for her husband's papers, which today are among the greatest treasures preserved in the library of congress, and this was nearly all she had left when she died the last few years of her life.

Washington the Richest. George Washington was the richest man in the United States at the time of his death, being worth about three-quarters of a million dollars. Hayes was comfortably off. So likewise was Arthur, who left $300,000 to be divided between his son, Allan, and his daughter, Nellie. None of this, however, was saved in the white house, where he entertained his friends lavishly and lived up to his salary.

Four ex-presidents died poor. Jefferson's private entertaining at "Monticello" greatly augmented his financial troubles, and he was at length obliged to ask congress to buy his library and historical papers. This was done, $23,000 being paid for the books and documents, but the money did him over for a while only. Monroe left the white house in debt. Andrew Jackson was nearly ruined by assuming the debts of his son, Sevier, and he managed to leave one slave to each member of his family, including his infant grandchildren.

Grant Dies Poor. Grant, up to the time of the civil war, had always been a failure in everything he undertook. He had shown himself so incompetent in business matters that nobody cared to enter into any business relations with him. Nevertheless (as often happens in such cases) business had strong attractions for him, and, leaving the white house with about $100,000 saved from his salary, he was drawn into partnership by an unscrupulous person named Ward, in New York. The firm of Grant & Ward soon "busted," and the hero of Appomattox was glad to accept from his friend, William H. Vanderbilt, a loan of $100,000 on his collection of medals and other trophies largely consisting of gifts received from royalties and municipalities while making his tour of the world. An he had to leave his family when he died at Mount McGregor was his scarcely completed book.

Five presidents died in office—William Henry Harrison, Taylor, Lincoln, Garfield and McKinley. The last three of these were murdered. Five former occupants of the white house were alive in January, 1882—Van Buren, Tyler, Fillmore, Pierce and Buchanan. Three died on the fourth of July—John Adams, Jefferson and Monroe. Adams and Jefferson, oddly enough, died on the same day—the fiftieth anniversary of the signing of the declaration of independence, in the framing of which they had collaborated.

Washington Was Bled to Death. Three presidents died of general debility due to old age—John Adams, at 81; Madison, at 85, and Monroe, at 73. Three died of paralysis—J. Q. Adams, Fillmore, and Johnson. Polk died of Asiatic cholera, caught during a trip through the south, and Taylor succumbed to "malaria-morbus," attributed to a mixture of cherries, ice water and milk, in large quantities on a hot day. Pierce died of inflammation of the stomach and Tyler from a bilious attack. The assigned cause of death in Washington's case was acute barry gilla, but wholesale bleeding by the doctors—the ignorant medical method of those days—was largely responsible. Van Buren died of catarrh of the throat and lungs, and Jackson was mortally stricken by consumption. Buchanan died of rheumatism. Grant of a throat cancer, Hayes of paralysis of the heart, and Arthur of apoplexy. William H. Taft and Grover Cleveland hold the record as the only men who ever occupied the presidential chair. But Cleveland became comparatively thin before he died.

Mr. Taft entered the white house practically without a cent. He will leave it with at least $75,000. It is scarcely a competence, but that is a matter of no importance whatever, for, as already explained, the mere fact of having been president will be worth at least $50,000 a year to him for the rest of his life. And if he should predecease his wife, she will receive, according to a custom, a pension of $3,000 a year.
